Dear Ms. Wood:

My goal in writing my essay "Lead the Way," is to describe and explain why my compass is such an important object in my life and how it helped me get through some tough times. It means so much more than what it seems.

The essay as a whole, I believe includes many details to help make the story and picture more clear. I specifically think I did well with describing the events chronologically and made the story flow from one event to the other. Another element I think you'll like is the paragraph where "I noticed a sunray that shined through my window curtain pointing directly at this small, unexpected item." This description was like a spotlight on the solution; this was the point in time where it seemed like the heavens shined a light on what would help me.

Like any essay, there is always something that could be done better. The part that specifically concerns me is where I was talking about the things I was doing better during my recovery. I feel like I could've gone more in depth with how I got out of that dark time in my life. Also, I'm not positive if I've used the necessary punctuation for some sections of the essay. Please let me know if there are revisions or editing I need to do.

This essay was something I constantly thought about during the weeks of writing it. I hope that it conveys the story I wanted to tell about my compass. I also am anticipating your feedback and overall thoughts on it.

Sincerely,

[I would sign here]
